All over the word national parks are considered to be the most important reserves of biodiversity and are the political symbol of conservation and sustainable development in every nation. Italy is no exception. We are ever more convinced of the importance of their role for saving the life of the whole planet. We consider them an essential instrument for safeguarding and promoting awareness of the riches of the landscape and the culture of our nation. For over 100 years, a spirited movement, of workers, scholars and associations, has strived to preserve, support and value our nation's national parks.

Do they do it because Italy is the country with the greatest variety of living species in Europe? Do they do it to protect habitats and unique species of flora and fauna throughout the whole national territory, like the Steinbock goat, the Marsican brown bear and the Edelweiss flower? Of course. But also because every protected area is the key to discovering the roots, the traditions and the identity of our territories.

MAJELLA

Breath-taking landscapes, enchanting woods and forests, extremely rare plants and flowers, spectacular archaeological sites, fascinating historic centres and unique medieval hamlets are only some of the marvels visitors can stumble upon.
Every Italian park offers routes that can satisfy all the desires of anyone who loves the great outdoors. From excursions, to walks, to calendars rich with cultural initiatives and events based on the food and the sampling of typical produce from each region.

But visiting the parks is also an occasion to come into contact with the businesses that work within these protected areas, offering genuine products made according to traditional methods. Every protected area has a priceless heritage, a portfolio of enormous scientific value and is a delight to tourists who come from Italy and all over the world. Here, thanks to the initiative 'Expo e Territori' you can discover 16 of the many areas, which tell the story of the unique biodiversity of our land. Don't miss the opportunity to find out about them and come to visit!
